What is a root canal treatment?

A root canal treatment is a dental procedure that is conducted to remove inflamed pulp or infected pulp on the inside of a tooth. You may need a root canal to save a tooth from extraction.

What happens before a root canal treatment?

Prior to a root canal treatment, your dentist will take a look at the affected tooth and the surrounding tissues as well as use x-rays to determine the extent of the damage. In cases where the damage is extensive and the tooth is severely infected, oral surgery may be necessary to remove the tooth if it can't be saved.

Why do I need a root canal?

There are several reasons for this. One is that, in most cases, a root canal treatment determines the ultimate salvageability of the tooth and whether a proper restoration can be placed without compromising the integrity of the tooth. The second reason is the ease of treatment.

Do I need a root canal to save a tooth from extraction?

You may need a root canal to save a tooth from extraction. The process of a root canal helps get rid of bacteria from the infected root canal, which will help prevent reinfection and keep it from spreading to other teeth. If you need root canal therapy, you should visit the root canal specialists at Park Crossing Dentistry.

How does a root canal work?

Next, they drill a hole through the decayed tooth to get to the infected pulp, then remove the infected materials and clean out the area to prevent reinfections. Since the root canal procedure involves removing a vital part of the tooth, it will also need to be filled as a measure of strengthening and protection.

Can a holistic dentist recommend a root canal?

Most holistic dentists would not recommend this. The simple truth is that the only alternative to a conventional root canal is an extraction of the tooth.
