What are the payment arrangements for wind farm leases?

The payment arrangements for wind farm leases vary and will be decided when negotiating lease terms. Some landowners will want the reliability of fixed-term rent that's paid regardless of how well a project performs. This is usually paid annually and typically increases with inflation to prevent the erosion of earnings.

Can landowners sell wind lease payments?

Yes- landowners receiving payments from wind farm developers can market and sell those future payments. It is important for landowners that have leased their land for wind farms to consider selling their wind lease payments up front for a lump sum due to a few reasons:

Can property owners make a profit from wind farms?

As energy developers look to acquire more land for wind farming, property owners stand to make a profit--literally. The wind energy sector compensates farmers, ranchers, and landowners upwards of $222 million every year to lease property for wind turbines--a number that is expected to rise exponentially in the foreseeable future.

How much money does a wind turbine make a year?

Each 1.5- or 3-MW turbine earns an annual royalty payment of $5,000 and $8,000, he says. The wind companies pay property taxes on the commercial facility, but not on the leased land. Most wind-power leases today provide for similar royalties based on revenue, Ferrell says -- typically 3-5% of gross earnings.

How can a wind farm developer make a profit?

The initial contact might be with a landman who wants to lease your property for as little as possible, then flip your lease to a wind farm developer and make a profit. That profit should be yours! LandGate can market your property directly to the developers and get you the best price.

Should you Lease Your farmland for wind power?

Leasing your farmland for wind power offers another source of income-- one that lets you continue farming the land. But wind agreements create complex legal and financial issues, and affect your property rights far into the future, says Jennifer Jambor-Delgado, a staff attorney at Minnesota-based Farmers' Legal Action Group.
